This American Life episode: "babies buying babies"

"Wry and terrifying story about buying dolls and racial prejudice. The white dolls sell out, then the Asian ones....then the light brown ones...."

Prom Night in Mississippi

true-story documentary about what happened when the actor Morgan Freeman donated money to his Mississippi hometown for a race-integrated prom. I have used this film in class, and it is powerful. (<http://www.imdb.com/title/tt1334555/>)

Articles:

New edition of A World of Babies, (Gottlieb and DeLoache), chapter by Sirad Shiridon on Somali-Americans, Some really sensitive discussions, especially toward the end of the chapter.

There's also some ethnographic studies of South Asian and Asian American teenagers (Bucholtz and Hall, S. Shankar, A. Reyes).

Pamela Perry "WHITE MEANS NEVER HAVING TO SAY YOU'RE ETHNIC: White Youth and the Construction of "Cultureless" Identities" shows very nicely how normalizing and naturalizing whiteness - and marking others - tacitly affirms white superiority and holds it up as a structural relation.

Scott Keisling's work with college fraternity members and their linguistic performances of white masculinity may be out of your focus, but is great too.

Gloria Wekker's 2016 book White Innocence: Paradoxes of Colonialism and Race.

It's about the Netherlands, but one chapter focuses on the Dutch tradition of Zwarte Piet (Black Pete), who annually visits children with Santa Claus (Sinterklaas). It might be a good comparative to look at how race and white privilege functions through the myth of the Dutch as a 'tolerant' nation.

You might look at Hirschfeld's work from the 1990s. This has been critiqued by Christina Toren, if I remember correctly – but both may be useful. Race is just one of the many categories children are learning the relational aspects of – so perhaps Ochs's work on language and behavioral learning/acquisition might also be useful.

I don't know if this would be what you are looking for, but an interesting case study is that of Derek Black, which provides some insight into what it is like to grow up within that type of culture and the factors that might help someone break out of it:
